On a test case before the District Court at Davenport on the 1st Judge Hayes decided that the Iowa Prohibition amendment had not been legally made a part of the State Constitution, chiefly on the ground that the journals of the State Legislature do not contain this act in full on their pages, and do not contain the yeas and nays taken upon the same, and that, according to the journals, the act as passed by the Senate was in its terms prohibitory of the sale or manufacture of liquor, not only as a beverage but also "to be used," and hence prohibited it and its use for all and sundry purposes, even sacramental, medicinal, etc.; but as it passed the House, it was in terms merely prohibitory of liquor as a beverage. In these respects, therefore, the requirements of the Constitution providing for the manner of its amendment had been disregarded. The journal does not contain the proper entries, and the same act has not passed both houses of the Legislature. The case will go to the Supreme Court.

WILLIAM DICKSON, foreman of the late Star-route jury, who had been taken to prison before the Criminal Court of the District of Columbia to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt in having written a letter to the Grand Jury that reflected upon Judge Wylie, filed his answer on the 1st, explaining that he meant no disrespect to the court. FRONTON, O., November 1. William Neal and Ellis Craft were convicted some months ago at the Cateletsburg (Boyd County, Ky.) Circuit Court, of the murder of Robert and Fannie Gibson and Emma Cuddeyer. They were given a new trial by the Supreme Court. George Ellis, an accomplice, who confessed to and was sentenced to imprisonment for life, was hanged by a mob, at Ashland, last summer.

On Monday last Neal and Craft, guarded by two hundred and twenty state troops, with one section of artillery, arrived at Cateletsburg, and were held for safe-keeping, to stand trial.

It was learned at Ashland, in some mysterious way, that Judge Brown was going to grant a change of venue, and the excitement there became intense. About eleven o'clock this morning word was telegraphed from that place to Cateletsburg that most of the men had quit work in the iron works, and that the rail cars had closed down. All the men, so the dispatch stated, were armed with revolvers.

In an hour or so nearly one hundred and fifty of them did arrive, and a hard, determined-looking crowd they were. They carried no weapons except their own hands. As they marched sullenly about the streets, the rumors of coming trouble increased.

At one o'clock the court-house yard was most densely packed with men, most of whom seemed to be from the surrounding counties. The court-house was packed when the soldiers marched in with the prisoners. The soldiers went inside the bar, surrounded the prisoners, and prepared to defend them to the last.

For a change of venue was overwhelming. Judge Brown said he was sorry to say, for the honor of his old home, that Boyd County could give the accused men a fair trial, and he would have to grant a change of venue.

A TERRIBLE TRAGEDY.

Mrs. Seguin, Wife of the Celebrated New York Physician Blindfolded and Fined Her Three Children, and Shoots Them Alternately—She Then Puts a Bullet Through Her Own Brain—The Husband and Father Almost Insane from Grief and Despair.

NEW YORK, October 31. Mrs. Seguin, aged thirty-six, wife of Dr. Edward C. Seguin, the noted specialist on diseases of the brain, killed her three young children this afternoon, and then killed herself at No. 41 West Twenty-third street. There is no other case known for the horrible tragedy than the insanity of the mother. The children were Edward D., aged six years; John Van Dusen, aged five years; and Jeannette, four years. They were all shot through the head and instantly killed. The mother's death was as sudden as theirs. The frightful feature of the tragedy is the manner of the murder. Mrs. Seguin took the children to an empty spare room at the top of a five-story house. In the absence of her husband, and while the servants were engaged in the basement, and locked the door behind them. The servants believed they had gone out for a walk.

What happened in the room will never be known, but when Dr. Amidon, Mrs. Seguin's father, called at five o'clock, and with his suspicions aroused by the absence of the children, he made a search of the house, the mother and children were found dead, all shot through the head. The children's hands were behind their backs with whif-ropes. They were blindfolded with handkerchiefs, and from all appearances, they must have been executed. They had been dead for at least an hour and a half, and were quite cold when discovered. Three pistols were found in the room, all of heavy caliber and all had been used.

Mrs. Seguin had been dependent from Mrs. Seguin's father, about seven o'clock, and upon hearing the dreadful news was utterly prostrated. He is in a state of mental distress, and under the care of physicians.

Dr. Seguin is a noted specialist in cases of insanity. His father was equally so. His wife was the daughter of a Massachusetts farmer. The couple moved in the best society. The family lived in a five-story brownstone front English basement house, elegantly furnished. The room in which the tragedy took place is on the fifth floor, and is scarcely ever used by the family.

The three servants in the house noticed during the day that Mrs. Seguin was in the mood condition she had been in for several weeks. "The blues," about eleven o'clock he called upon her, and she said she did not feel well and had written to Henry Dray, who was in the city, to come to the house, and to tell her that he would all enjoy themselves.

He took it, joyfully, and told her that he would all enjoy themselves. He called on his sister at three o'clock, and was told she had gone out for a walk. He returned at five o'clock, but Mrs. Seguin had not returned. The hall-boys accidentally mentioned that the door of the spare room was locked and the key gone. A sudden suspicion seized the doctor that Mrs. Seguin had gone to the Central Park and drowned herself, and the children. He could not get into the room, but he thought it best to go in and see what had happened. He went up stairs and burst the door of the room open. A horrible sight met his eyes. The mother lay in the middle of the floor lay the dead body of the eldest boy, Edward, in a pool of blood. Partly a closet near Mrs. Seguin, greatly frightened, he ran to the door and called for help. He found the mother and children dead. The mother had taken the children into the room on the pretense of playing blindman's bluff. She had let the two youngest, John and Jeannette, into the room, and had locked them in while she murdered the eldest boy. The pistol with which she shot was a target-practice weapon, with a barrel eleven inches long. It lay beside him, and the bullet lay on the floor. It had passed through his head. The mania mother then proceeded to the closet, and with a heavy three-barrel revolver, with which she was very expert, she shot her two youngest, John and Jeannette, and then turned on her own brains, shot the other two children.

Dr. Amidon cut the strings that bound the children's hands and laid them on the bed. The police and coroner were notified, and the body was taken to the morgue. Nothing was found in the room to explain the motive for the terrible crime.

The doctor held the woman close to her victims' heads, for the handkerchiefs on their faces had been burned. The face of the little girl was a look of intense suffering, and she was more deeply than any other feature of the tragedy.

HER MAJESTY CHRISTINE.

I am seventy, gray and bald;
I have a little white hair;
And she rules me like a queen,
She has such a royal way.
Whoever she may be,
I am eager to obey.
Her majesty Christine.
She has robes of wondrous white,
She has such a royal way.
Whoever she may be,
I am eager to obey.
Her majesty Christine.
I have seventy summers told;
She is exactly five years old;
Promptly still, she says mamma,
But no one has ever said
Such a thing to my queen
As I am to sweet Christine
When she calls me grandpa.

COMETS.

Prof. Proctor's Views About Comets and Their Peculiarities.

To the Editor of the New York Herald:

During the last two years many comets, some of them bright ones, have been seen, and from all sides a question reaches me. Do we know more about comets than we did two years ago? I wish that I could honestly answer. We know a great deal more, but I cannot. Still, something has been added to our knowledge, and, unless I mistake, although that something may in itself be slight, the manner in which it has been learned is such that the small medium of new truth is full of promise.

I suppose every one who reads these lines knows pretty well what are now the chief difficulties in cometic science. We want to know why, as the comet approaches the sun, it throws out all around it, and chiefly toward the sun, the luminous appendages we call the coma or hair—really, so far as we can judge, a nebulous or gaseous envelope. We want next to know why the matter thus thrown out seems to become subject to a repulsive force by which it is strongly driven from the sun to form what is called the comet's tail. We want to know how much of the light of the comet's nucleus (or bright part) comes or is reflected from the sun, and how much is inherent. Also, having ascertained beyond all possibility of doubt or error that part of the light, in all three cases is inherent, we want to know how sufficient heat is acquired to raise nucleus, coma and tail to actual inherent luminosity.

Now, in former years, and especially during the appearance of the comets of Winnecke and Brorsen, in 1865, astronomers recognized that a part of the light of some comets, at any rate, is due to the inherent luminosity of certain compounds of carbon and hydrogen. Dr. William Huggins, of London, is not a very daring scientific speculator; he usually keeps his side of excessive caution. (Indeed I have myself been at one time respecting his results for the last fourteen years, what he now only begins to state for himself) therefore, when he does speak positively we may believe that he has found the evidence overwhelmingly strong. Well, he says in a lecture very recently delivered before the Royal Institution: "The general conclusion is that in the case of some comets, at least, the bright bands in the cometary light with those seen in the spectra of hydrocarbons justifies us fully in ascribing the light of these comets to matter which contains carbon in combination with hydrogen."

Until quite recently this has been the only matter which has been clearly recognized by the spectroscopic method as forming part of the substance of comets. And the wonder has been that substance so refractory as carbon—a substance which cannot be vaporized in our laboratories under any ordinary conditions—should thus appear in the form of luminous vapor in the case of comets further from the sun than our own earth. It is difficult to see where the heat can come from by which the carbon present in these bodies can thus give light evidence (which means also heat-evidence) of its presence. It is not carbon only which is thus shown to be present, nor even carbon and hydrogen only; nitrogen seems also to be indicated. Professors Living and Dewar have found that certain bright lines are only present in the spectra of certain compounds of carbon when nitrogen is also present, and that in fact they indicate the presence of cyanogen, a well-known nitrogen compound of carbon. Now these bright lines have not only been seen, they have been photographed in the spectrum of the brightest comet of 1881 (by Dr. William Huggins in London, and by Dr. Henry Draper in New York). A part, then, of the light of every comet is inherent, and comes from a luminous mixture of carbon, hydrogen, nitrogen and probably oxygen also. A part of the light, is, however, reflected sunlight, nearly the whole of the light being thus reflected, and a great portion of the light of the coma, with a smaller portion of the light of the nucleus. Even here, however, we cannot be sure that all the light which might be reflected sunlight is really so. The only way in which we can distinguish such light from inherent light coming from glowing solid or liquid matter, is by noting that when we analyze reflected sunlight certain lines (hundreds of them) are missing, so that across the rainbow tinted streak, into which the spectrum scope resolves such light, there are seen numbers of dark lines corresponding to those missing tints. In the case of light from a self-luminous solid or liquid mass no such dark lines are seen. But the faint light of a comet is not very easily analyzed as closely as is necessary, to show whether these dark lines exist or not. Until quite recently astronomers have been content to regard the presence of a continuous rainbow-tinted spectrum, with or without lines, as evidence that the comet shone by reflected sunlight. Now, however, a closer scrutiny has been made, and in the spectrum of the brightest comet in 1881, the lines have succeeded in detecting the dark lines (the so-called Fraunhofer lines) of the solar spectrum. These lines have even been photographed by Dr. Huggins (the don't show in Dr. Huggins' photographs). Now, failing to detect these dark lines means little or nothing, seeing them, however, and still more, photographing them, is decisive, making it absolutely certain that part of the comet's light is reflected sunlight. There must be matter like meteoric dust in the head and nucleus and probably in the tail also of a comet to enable it to shine in this way by reflecting the light of the sun.

But the latest comet which has yet been observed with the spectroscopic method has brought fresh news. I refer to Wells' comet, sometimes called, rather oddly, Comet Wells. The spectrum of this comet did not at first show the dark bands to which I have referred. "The cyanogen groups," says Dr.

The Latest New York Heros.

There is something peculiarly appalling, even at this distance, the New York tragedy involving the suicide of Mrs. Dr. Seguin after she had slaughtered her three young children. The conditions surrounding the affair seem to intensify the horror. Mrs. Seguin was a small, delicate woman, of sensitive character and refined associations, and among the very best persons whom even insanity might be expected to betray into such bloodthirsty brutality. But the measure in this case is further increased by the circumstances that Mrs. Seguin lived among physicians who apparently did not suspect the conditions of insanity which alone can explain the deed she committed. Her husband, Dr. Amos, was a constant visitor at the house and took his meals there. Dr. Draper, one of the leading physicians of New York, was to dine with the family on the very day of the tragedy, which would denote that he was not insane, and that her husband, Dr. Seguin, is a well-known specialist, as his father was before him, in nervous diseases and the treatment of insanity.

These conditions suggest two reflections. In the first place, it would seem that progress in the diagnosis of mental disorders, when insanity can steal like a thief in the night upon a woman of gentle nature and happy surroundings under the very eyes of experts. This case is calculated to impair confidence in the expert testimony which physicians are accustomed to give as to the causes and indications of insanity, and in the practice they pursue in the treatment thereof. In the next place, it is not impossible that the very atmosphere in which Mrs. Seguin lived may have produced the morbidness which finally obscured her sense of right and wrong, and converted her into a fiend. It is the tendency of specialists to go to extremes. All people do who ride hobbies or run in grooves. The physician who devotes himself to some particular phase of human ailment is apt to discover evidences of its existence in every case which comes before him. Dr. Seguin has probably been clear in his own mind, a specialist in every nervous disorder he treated. His professional skill was concentrated in the effort to arrest or cure insanity. It is not unlikely that his conversation at home, like his practice and his studies, drifted into discourse and analysis of mental aberration. If he resembles most of his class, he has been predisposed to regard most people as insane or verging upon insanity who are not in his own mind. Have generalizations of that kind exerted a depressing and morbid influence over the poor wife who has now robbed his home of all that made it dear to him? Such a theory is by no means far-fetched, and it is well beyond the possible explanation of the mysterious tragedy in Dr. Seguin's family.

If physicians who make a specialty of treating insanity know so little of it that it may be developed suddenly under their immediate observation into the most horrible and fatal disease, and at the same time contribute to the spread of insanity by their own morbid ideas on the subject, then it will be better for mankind if the specialty of insanity be abandoned and the doctors confine themselves to the treatment of functional disorders according to the best experience they can command. —Chicago Tribune.

Boycotting an Idol.

At a place called Brindaban, in the Maharajah of Jeypore's territory, there has long been a Hindoo temple containing within its walls a particularly sacred idol named Gohindji. This was supposed to protect the royal dynasty, and in return successive Maharajahs were very polite to Gohindji and very liberal to his attendants. So all went smoothly until the late Maharajah came to the throne. His predecessors had belonged to the Vaishnava sect, and the idol's priestly attendants were, of course, of that persuasion also. But the new ruler, actually introduced a Shiva priest into the temple to help him in worshipping Gohindji. When the Vaishnavas, who hate the Shivas, heard of this desecration, they sent the Maharajah to Coventry and made a solemn vow that they would never look upon poor Gohindji again or enter the door of his temple. This by itself might not have mattered much to the idol, but the enraged Vaishnavas surrounded the temple with a cordon of trusty emissaries, who warned away pilgrims under divers pains and penalties. The consequence was that the shrine became deserted, its revenues fell away to zero, and Gohindji suffered so seriously in reputation that he became quite an unconsidered idol. —London Globe.

Pigeon Shooting.

Dan Pelter and Jo Joslin took considerable pride in their marksmanship. They made a bet last Thursday in the following terms, viz.:

"A pigeon is to be let loose and Pelter is to hit it with a rifle shot on the wing. If the next pigeon a loose is shot in the same manner and hit in the same way by Joslin, then Joslin wins; if not, then Joslin loses."

Both fired and both missed the bird entirely. —Referee decided as follows, viz.:

As Dan Pelter has missed he has lost his money.

As Joslin did not hit in the same spot he has also lost his money.

3. There being, therefore, no proper claimant for the money it is "treasure trove," and the stakeholder may keep it indefinitely.

The stakeholder invested the money in circus tickets for the club, and now Pelter and Joslin are both opposed to gambling in pigeons. —Detroit Free Press.

To make Cough Syrup take four teaspoonfuls of castor oil, four teaspoonfuls of molasses and one teaspoonful of paraffin. Mix together and take a teaspoonful a dose four or five times a day. Mothers, try this; a month-old baby can take a few drops, six months a half a teaspoonful and a year-old a spoonful. When a child has a cold and threatened with croup, begin giving the syrup during the day and on going to bed. The coughs during the night give more. It will not fail to prevent croup and cure it. A grown person can take a larger dose. —Indianapolis Journal.
