WILL STICK TO GOLD. President Cleveland Declares Himself on

WASHINGTON, April 24 .- In an interview concerning the financial situation President Cleveland said: President Cleveland said: "The inclination on the part of the public to accept newspaper reports concerning the inten-tions of those charged with the management of our national finances seems to jus-tify my emphatic contradiction of the statement that the redemption of any kind of treasury notes except in gold has at any time been determined upon or contem-plated by the secretary of the treasury or any other member of the present administration. The president and his cabinet are absolutely harmonious in the determination to exercise every power conferred upon them to maintain every power conferred upon them to exercise the public credit, to keep the public faith and to preserve the parity between gold and silver and between all financial obligations of the govern-

DR. JOHN A. BROADUS relates that Ole Bull once said to him: "If I quit practicing on my violin for a day I notice the difference; if I quit for two days my friends notice the difference; if 1 quit for a week everybody notices the difference." This is only an amplified version of the French saying that genius is patience long continued. It it like Sarah Bernhardt rehearsing a play a hundred times, as she is said to have done, before permitting the curtain to rise before an audience.

THE unexpected sometimes happens even in politics. In Jersey City recently the republicans of a certain ward, in which there is a large democratic majority, met to nominate candidates for various offices, a mere formality for the sake of party discipline. The last place to be filled was that of justice of the peace. As a joke one man suggested the elevator boy of the building in which the meeting was held as the candidate. It was seconded and carried. The election came and the elevator boy found himself duly elected justice of the peace. The boy was a sensible one and stuck to his elevator.

THE London Telegraph puts aside insular prejudice for a moment to call Thomas Edison "the gifted electrician. the real magician, the real wonder-workgroes. er, the wizard whose rod has been that of Aaron and has swallowed up all the other enchanters' 'bagnettes,' whose fame has become world-wide, who never had more than two months' schooling and who began life at the age of twelve as a railway newsboy." Mr. Edison has had a surfeit of praise, but he will probably regard this, when he considers its source and all, as the very climax of compliments. And happily it is well deserved.

spring. The fullrbed moon hung like a great golden disk in the heavens, bathing the green southen landscape in a radiant sheen. The magnolia and orange trees had already put forth their white blossoms, which thaled a delicious fragrance.

Mrs. Beveridge stepped out upon the wide veranda, extending round two sides of the fine old colonial mansion, where as a happy bride she had come ten years before. She was now alone. Heriatest guests, friends from Memphis, had left for home on the preceding day. For almost the first time since her marriage she was without company, Both she and her husband had been ond of entertaining, and their success in the art had been unrivaled. Prostrated with grief for some months over the sudden death of her husband three years before, Mrs. Beveridge had been surrounded during that period by friends who feared the shock would leave her a mental wreck or a life-long invalid. Gradually, however, she was stored to a semblance of her former self, though by no means to the gay, rivacious woman she had been.

On the evening referred to, her servints had trooped off to a country dance. Mrs. Beveridge would have been enaptured with the beauties of the night, as her plump, shapely shoulders leaned against a pillar of the veranda, had not a nameless dread possessed her. The heavy stillness was oppressive. The scent of the magnolia blossoms reninded her of the romantic period of er married life, and thoughts of her husband brought on an attack of ncholy.

Going into the library, she picked up novel, and tried to read it. Page after page she mechanically perused without understanding a word. She continued to read, now and then sensing passage, but mainly absorbed in her wn vaguely disturbing reverie.

At length, she grew too nervous to persist longer in the effort. Throwing dining-room and lighted the candehe drawing-room and lighted the chanelier and the piano lamp. Seating herself before the piano she began playing a Waldteufel waltz. But the music only served to sadden her spirits. She placed on the rack a favorite vocal comosition, and sang it in a rich contralto roice. The sentiment of the song ed to lift from her soul a great weight of depression, but she was still ll at ease. Time dragged on until a few minutes after midnight, when Mrs. Beveridge resolved to go to her boudoir, on the foor above. Leaving the lights glowing in the library, dining-room, front hall and drawing-room, she ascended to her sleeping apartment. The succeed-ing hour she devoted to writing to sevral friends. Shortly after one o'clock Mrs. Beverdge stepped into bed. She courted sleep by some of those mental resources which are said to win the presence of Morpheus. But it was futile. She could not even lie quietly. Finally she ly roaring with rage and uttering the heard the hall clock strike two. Soon afterward she began to feel the first symptoms of sleep. But suddenly, be-ing nervously roused from her drowsiness, she dropped one arm limply over the side of the bed. Her hand came in contact with a shock of curly hair! Instinctively Mrs. Beveridge knew that she had touched the head of a man -a man who had been concealing him-self under her bed. The blood in her veins seemed to congeal; but, strangely enough, her senses did not desert her. Stiffing her first impulse to raise an outery, with admirable presence of mind she gave a very good imitation of a person yawning in sleep, and re-mained silent. After an interval of a few seconds she eard a noise beneath her bed, and resently a dark form stood beside her. "Don't pertend you're asleep," said a leep, gruff voice, "for I know you ain't. "ve seen that kind o' make-believe beore. Come, now, I want no nonsense. You jes' git up and shell out your fine amonds and all your ready cash." The villain, while thus speaking, had hipped out a formidable-looking reolver, which he held recklessly pointed at Mrs. Beveridge's head. I shan't do you any harm," he went "if you do as I tell you to. But set up any howlin' or try to play any tricks on me and I'll put you to sleep for good, and don't you make any mistake about it."

I you don't want to get shot in the A moment later she surrendered her ourse, containing nearly one hundred tollars. But he insisted that she must have more money somewhere in the house. Then she handed him a wallet taken from her dead husband's writing table, in which the burglar found more than seven hundred dollars, in bank notes. In the same drawer he spied Mr. Beveridge's watch and chain, which he appropriated. Then he said he would like to have the best of the silverware, ast week was reported without recommenda and thereupon drew from'a capacious pocket a cotton bag which, he intimated, would hold all the other valuables that he could lug away conveniently. "Oh, yes," said Mrs. Beveridge, her heart fluttering with a hope that she could detain the monster until some of the male servants should return and capture him. "There are cold meats, preserves, good bread and butter, pickles-"

"By Gorry," interrupted the burglar, his mouth watering, "you're a real nice woman. I'll try some of your victuals. Hustle 'em right on."

Lighting a small hand lamp, Mrs. Beveridge led the way into the pantry and began to prepare a luncheon for her grisly visitor. The burglar imme-diately addressed himself to the edibles with gusto. At every other mouthful he complimented "the lady," as he called her, upon the excellence of the "grub." "But," he ventured, "it would go bet-

Mrs. Beveridge wholly appreciated the situation. In no steady accents she replied: "If you will step into the hall while I dress I will do as you ask."

The burglar went into the hall to wait, while Mrs. Beverkige quickly clad herself, managing to hide in her bosom several papers representing many thou-sands of dollars. At that juncture the burglar reentered the apartment.

 A Shrewd Chicago Attorney Swindled Out of $$8,000. CHICAGO, April 22 .- By one of the boldest, cleverest "confidence" games ever perpetrated in the west Attorney

Jacob Newman was swindled last adroit sharper known to his vic-tim as Lyman L. Lamb, of Akron, O. The method adopted to effect the robbery was the shelf-worn one of exchanging a valise containing the cash for one exactly resembling it holding only waste paper. In the present instance the ruse was most successfully accomplished. Mr. Newman and Mr. Lamb together drew $28,000 of Mr. Newman's money from H. Schaffner & Co.'s bank, Mr. Newman's security being a draft for $35,000 given him by Mr. Lamb, which has since been found to be a forgery. The currency was placed in a valise brought to the bank by Mr. Lamb. Both men returned to the Chamber of Commerce building,
