PREVENTING DISEASE

The greatest difficulty with which lisease prevention societies are usually faced is unwillingness of \individual men and women to accept advice in maintaining health. The general inclination is to overlook the small warning rifts in health until they have developed into deep and often irreparable scars.

As a result, the same trouble that was experienced by the anti-tuberculosis societies in gaining popular support for their program of prevention has been met by other groups, such as those organized for the avoidance of blindness and deafness. Warning even when repeated again and again, apparently have little effect upon many people. The counsel either is entirely unheeded or is disregarded with the thought that "it's means for the other fellow-not me." The work of disease prevention so-ieties nevertheless has resulted in the saving of a great many lives and the elimination of much needed illness. A striking example is the reduction in Miss Margaret Reopcke spent the the tuberculosis death rate since the early years of the twentleth century, when organizations such as the Michigan Tuberculosia Association undertook a systematic educational campaign against the disease. True, the death per 100,000 inhabitants, the figure for 1928, is a vast reduction from the death rate of 200 that was regis tered twenty-five years ago:

The primary need today, with our disease prevention-societies as well as they are is for a public willingness to heed their teachings and to apply personally the widely broadcast warnings. Only in that way can eventual success in the lifesaving against preventable diseases be assured.

FUNDAMENTALLY SOUND

Many people are worrying about the future of the smaller communities. There is no need for it.

It is true that statistics show s end of nonulation from the farms and smaller towns to the larger cities. it is also a fact that many smaller communities, just as in the case of many cities, have had retrogression instead of progress.

Compare the country town of today with that of a generation or even ten appearance. A few years ago small towns did not pave their streets and park their boulevards. They do now, Smaller communities have the same facilities for convenience that the cities have. Compare the schools of today with the old times. These things are all evidences, not of decay, but of

It has been argued that the new levelopments of transportation have interferred with the smaller communities. Perhaps that is true, if we consider but one side of the question. It is true that in the days of the horse and the local railroad train that people did not travel as they do today.

There was no desire for it. The automobiles moves people back and forthand hither and yon, to which some object. But the automobile has placed a garage or filling station upon nearly every corner in town. Good roads have made it easy for people to get to cities but they have also made it ensy for the city folks to travel to outlying communities. every month sees something new in the process of retailing. Within the past two years the mail order houses have suffered a great decline in trade volume. To overcome it they are establishing retail outlets in many cities. The chain stores have cut into the mail order business and with the chain stores have come new methods and new problems which effect every mer-

We cannot believe that these new conditions spell disaster for the smaller communities. . In fact the new methods and ideas of merchandising are making the smaller communities more attractive places to buy and trade. Give the local merchant the impetus of good merchandising methods in addition to his personal activity and influence and he is beyond compestore windows, who does not display this goods and let the public know that he is in business, who buys carelessly and extends credit too generously is doomed for failure. The progressive small town merchant never had a better opportunity than today.

Of course, small towns partake of the conditions of the industry which surrounds them. Agriculture is not now at its best—that is—it could be better. When farm lands have a stable value, when the population changes its destination from city to country, the rural communities will advance to unprecedented levels of prosperity. This period of readjustment is by no means as serious as some will believe. The smaller community and its outlying section has always been the background of American life. It al-ways will be.—Grand Rapids (Minn.) Hearald-Roviow.
