Quick Spreading with a Low Cloverleaf

WHEN you are covering a strip eight feet wide or better, every time you haul out a load of manure, it does not take long to get the field covered. That's what the Low Cloverleaf does—spreads eight feet wide, or even more under certain conditions. And the manure can be spread just as thick, eight feet wide, as it was in the four-foot strip of the old fashioned spreader. This wide spread feature is a wonder.

Honestly, there are so many good things to say about the Low Cloverleaf spreader that we haven't the space to tell you all about it. Drop in when you can and look at the one we have set up. The wide spread feature is part of the machine—not an extra.

ALUMNI-HIGH SCHOOL BASKET BALL GAME

Several of the Old Time Stars Will Play on Alumni Team Saturday Evening.

The annual basket ball game between the alumni and Chelsea high school will be played Saturday evening, April 14th, in the Sylvan town hall.

The high school team this year ranks as among the best in the state and a close and interesting game is anticipated.

SHORT HISTORY OF OLD GLORY

National Emblem is An Evolution From the Many and Varied Flags of Revolution.

"Old Glory," as we know it, is the result of many changes. In the early days of the revolution there were almost as many standards as there were commanders. Every man who raised a regiment of colonists seems to have designed a flag of his own fancy.

Most of these ancestors of the "stars and stripes" were copied from the arms of the colony from which the revolutionary soldiers came. A month after the battle of Bunker Hill General Putnam displayed a red flag with the coat-of-arms of Connecticut.

Many of the revolutionary privateers adopted a flag bearing a mailed fist grasping 13 arrows. At Cambridge, 1776, Washington flew a flag with the 13 red and white stripes, such as the flag bears today, but with a reproduction of the British union-jack in the place now occupied by the blue field and stars.

The most famous of all the continental flags, however, was the rattlesnake banner with the motto, "Don't tread on me!" This was carried in many parts of the country.

Congress adopted a resolution June 4, 1777, stating "That the flag of the 13 United States be 13 stripes, alternate red and white; that the union be 13 stars, white in a blue field, representing the new constellation." The design may have been inspired by the Washington coat-of-arms, which had both stars and stripes.

It was apparently the intention to add both a stripe and a star for every new state admitted, but in 1818 the number of states had increased to 20 and the flag was rapidly getting out of shape. Congress altered the design to the style we have now.

Theresa Gillman was born in Orleans county, New York, April 27, 1845, and passed away March 25, 1917. When very young, she, with her parents, moved to Michigan and settled in White Oak, Ingham county. In 1878 she was united in marriage to Augustus Jansdorfer, who preceded her in death 18 years ago. She leaves three children, several brothers and sisters. Short funeral services were held at Williamsville by Rev. John J. Schuler, of Gregory. She was laid to rest in Williamsville cemetery.

A TRAGEDY OF CHILDHOOD.

A little girl of kindergarten age, skipping gaily along on her way to school Wednesday morning, stubbed her toe as she crossed the Michigan Central tracks on North Main street and struck her nose a cruel blow on a rail.

Away flew happiness, and for the tot it was a world of woe! Her nose pained her terribly and it was bleeding in a stream; also there was the fear that she would be late for school!

Two grown men standing near the crossing allowed her to pass without offering help, but across the tracks came a man prominent in the management of the Hollier plant—a busy man, but with a heart. In a second he had sensed a tragedy in the life of a child, had soothed the sobbing little one and shortly the flow of blood was checked, although at the expense of soiling his handkerchief and splashing his cuff and coat sleeve with blood.

Then he brought the little girl into the Tribune office, where the blood stains were washed away and she was sent along to school with rising spirits.

We strongly suspicion the "good Samaritan" in the case would feel embarrassed if we published his name and so he shall be nameless, but he's a man with a heart and we respect him for it.

NEW GARAGE FOR CHELSEA

Lower Floor of Conlan's Livery Will Be Converted Into Modern Service Station.

The lower floor of Conlan's livery and feed-stable, a solid cement block building on Jackson street, is being converted into a garage and service station and will be opened for business about April 23d by Grant, Tisch & Co.

J. A. Conlan will dispose of his livery stock and equipment at public auction on Saturday, but will still continue in business on the second floor of the building.

The new firm is composed of two experienced automobile repairmen, A. R. Grant and E. A. Tisch, both of whom have been employed in the Hollier plant until recently. Mr. Grant has had previous experience in the service departments of the Hudson and Reo companies, while Mr. Tisch has had experience in the service departments of the Paige, Olds, Briscoe and Hollier companies.

The old horse stalls have been torn out of the building and next week the floor will be cemented, additional windows will be cut in the north front and an office built in the northeast corner. The approaches to the building will also be improved.

The new garage is located almost directly back of the Crescent hotel and will be known as the Crescent garage. It will be Chelsea's third garage.

SWATH OF TERROR CUT BY DEAD EYE

Youth With Water Gun Garners
Gold and Jewels From Frightened New Yorkers.

TIRES OF TENDING BABY

Thirteen-Year-Old Desperado Does
Thriving Business Until Callous
Hand of the Law Cuts
Short His Career.

New York.—The callous hand of the law, which wots not of those glorious days when highwaymen strode abroad and garnered gold and jewels from fat and frightened burghers, summarily ended the newly fledged career of "Dead Eye," the boy terror, by carrying "Dead Eye" off to the donjon keep of the Children's society.

"Dead Eye," be it known to those whose prosaic minds know only material names and addresses, is Frank Kraus, who lives at 34 East Seventy-sixth street, and who is thirteen remarkably desperate years old. In about an hour and a half after he had determined to doff the drab garb of respectability and dish washing and baby tending to take up the perilous career of a highwayman with "Dead Eye" for his sobriquet, the youth made a record that will live long after he has reformed.

"Dead Eye" Sets Forth.

Armed with a water gun, a pocket full of nails, a red bandanna handkerchief twisted about his neck, a couple of novels recounting the lives of other bold highwaymen and a flashlight, "Dead Eye" set forth one night at nine o'clock. His first sally was to the tenement of Mrs. Palma Manning.

Mrs. Manning answered an innocent knock at the door to face the diminutive terror, who had the water gun pointed at her and who leered brisily from behind the black mask.

"Hands up and beware!" whispered "Dead Eye," and Mrs. Manning, with a scream, backed into a corner.

"Silence and yer valuables," the impassive "Dead Eye" added, "or you get killed."

With trembling hand, while the light from the flashlight flared in her eyes, Mrs. Manning handed over to "Dead Eye" $100 in cash, a gold watch, two gold bracelets, a diamond ring and a gold chain. "Dead Eye" seemed astonished at this lavish rain of wealth and as he stuffed the last of the booty into a frayed trousers pocket with a grimy hand, he said:

"Gosh!" but he recovered his aplomb quickly and, backing away with the water gun still pointed menacingly at Mrs. Manning, "Dead Eye" scurried to the street.

Hand of Law Descends.

A casual workman passed on his way home, and "Dead Eye" flashed the light in his face. The workman yelled and departed hurriedly. This cemented "Dead Eye's" determination that the bold and free life was indeed the career for a man of sporting instincts.

So he wandered down the street to Seventy-fifth street and First avenue, where a group of boys were playing. Hitting his mask over his face, he sallied into the gathering and motioning with his water gun he backed the terrified youngsters against a wall and commenced to rifle their pockets.

Then as he turned in triumph to bid the cravens depart, Policeman Shen of the East Sixty-seventh street station laid a heavy hand on his shoulders and "Dead Eye" the terror, faded into the oblivion of yesterday's triumph and Frankie Kraus was marched away to the Children's society.

In the meantime a squad of policemen with night sticks and pistols ready searched the neighborhood for the "big thief" of whom Mrs. Manning weepingly told.

They Both Blushed.

Milwaukee.—Esther Wright blushed. So did the judge. And Esther's pretty rounded shoulders turned pink as she bared them in open court. She wanted to show where Oscar Tweles, deaf mute, had made advances by bruising her in the sign language.

What You Will in Suits

In suits the powers that be in the world of fashion have been indulgent. They countenance widely different styles and allow us a choice to suit ourselves. If we want a wide-hip skirt we may have it, and if we object to more width than belongs to us, we are welcome to a straight up-and-down model.

A semifitted coat, with ripple coat-skirt is just as good style as the Norfolk jacket and an eon is just as good as either. The bottom of the coat may be cut in long points or trimmed evenly around, and sleeves may reach almost to the knuckles or decline to meet even the wrist by several inches. About the only thing that may not be ignored is buttons. Designers appear to have become erratic in this matter, and buttons, big and little, in crowds and regiments appear on coats and skirts. But if they are not to your liking you may be let off with a single big button at the front of your coat and a company of smaller ones in single file along the outside of your sleeve, from elbow to wrist.

A tan-colored suit of lightweight wool velour is shown in the picture. It is designed with three plaits at each side of the front and back of the coat and is a fine model for a slender figure. The plain sleeves are without cuffs, but an interesting finish is provided for them by a strap made of the material and fastened with a button. The pockets are extended at the top into a strap which turns back and is fastened with three small buttons. The rolled cape collar may be worn open or fastened to the throat, for a long row of fancy buttons at the front attests to their accordance with the mode.

Two New Lingerie Blouses

Dotted and embroidered Swiss, fine cotton voile and organdie, have a dainty charm that rivals that of sheer crepe and silks. Together with handkerchief linen they find georgette, wash satin and silk as mediums for working out springtime blouses, and all of them are manufactured in tints and colors as well as in white. When a little fine lace or hand embroidery is added to these sheer fabrics, the utmost in refinement is accomplished in blouses.

The two models shown are in dotted Swiss and organdie. A very sheer weaved dotted Swiss organdie, appears in embroidered and is used in the plain fabric for making ruffles and plaittings, collars and cuffs on blouses of other materials. The Swiss blouse with large dots has narrow tucks down the front and fastens with small buttons. The wide cuffs and collar are finished with lace-edged plaittings of plain Swiss organdie.

Groups of lengthwise tucks down the front and back break the surface of the plain organdie blouse. In the front a third group extends only to the bust line at each side, and these short tucks are omitted in the back of the blouse. The body of the blouse is set into a short yoke at the front and back. The sleeves are plain with flaring cuffs joined to them by narrow bands of eluiny lace. All seams are hemstitched. The rolling collar is of embroidered Swiss and fillet lace and is high at the back. The cuffs fasten with three small buttons and the fourth with tiny loops and buttons.

The blouses pictured are both in white. Among the new models there is a particularly pretty model in coral pink, decorated only with clusters of fine tucks and the hemstitching which joins all seams. The fronts are finished with wide hemstitched hems. One group of tuck at each side of the front runs from shoulder to waist and a second group crosses them just below the bust, running from the hem to the underarm seam. This model has a very short plain yoke and small shawl collar finished with a group of tucks and hemstitched hem. The sleeves are plain with their fullness gathered into a turn-back cuff.

Floating Veils.

Since the veils worked with gold and silver thread were first launched on their successful careers, veils have been increasing in importance every day. It now appears that the fellower of fads must either interpose a floating curtain of tulle between her face and an interesting world, or shroud her eyes in mystery and be perfectly frank about the rest of her features. The floating veil is outlined with metal thread and sports a decorative device—a spider, a bird or a beast—over one eye. The other kind, so narrow as hardly to deserve its name, is of lace or tulle, and, in the case of small hats that are pulled down on the forehead, is barely more than an inch wide. Long enough, though, to "light the light that lies in woman's eyes."

Blouses Have Mock Pockets.

About half way down the front of the new blouses where one might logically expect pockets, there are odd little motifs of white embroidery, which really do not look like pockets at all, but manage to give one that impression.

ROAD BUILDING

KEEPING UP IMPROVED ROADS

Ample Provision for Maintenance
Should Be Part of Highway System—Task Often Neglected.

(From the United States Department of Agriculture.)

Keeping good roads is the most important task in connection with an improved highway system, once the construction work is completed. In the United States in the past this task usually has been neglected, the improved roads in many instances being allowed to deteriorate until they became almost impassable, when they were, at heavy cost, rebuilt. That states and counties are now coming to recognize the need of careful and thoroughgoing maintenance, however, is indicated by studies of county road systems in different sections of the country recently made by the office of public roads and rural engineering of the department.

While some of the eight counties in which intensive studies were made were found to have no provisions for maintenance and others were found to pay for upkeep of the roads out of bond-issue funds, thus creating a debt that would outlive the temporary improvement for many years, two counties in widely separated states were found in which maintenance conditions were practically all that could be desired. In Mississippi, it was found, there is a state law requiring that a special annual tax of at least one mill be levied for the upkeep of all roads constructed by means of bond issues, the fund to be kept separate from all other funds to be used for maintenance only. Instead of deterioration taking place on the roads of some of the counties in other states in which examinations were made, it was found that in Lauderdale county, Mississippi, roads built several years ago and maintained from the special fund have actually improved since their completion.

The county roads of Franklin county, New York, it was found, are maintained with a contribution of 50 per cent by the state and under indirect state supervision. As a result of this system, the roads have been kept up to their condition on completion. While provisions for maintenance were on the whole not satisfactory in the counties of the other states in which studies were made, this condition since has been remedied in Virginia by the passage of a state law providing that an annual tax of not less than three per cent of the amount of bonds issued shall be levied to provide a maintenance fund for bond-built roads.

The existence of a regulation tending to lessen damage to roads and so to reduce maintenance costs was revealed by the studies in Spotsylvania county, Virginia, where the county supervisors had passed an ordinance placing a relatively low limit on loads that may be hauled in wagons fitted with narrow tires and a considerably higher limit on loads for wide-tired wagons. As a result, most of the wagons using the roads of the county have been fitted with tires ranging from three to six inches wide.

ROAD CONSTRUCTION IS SLOW

Estimated That United States Spending About $250,000,000 Annually on Improvements.

Road construction is bound to be slow because of its great cost. Figures show that the average cost of sand-clay roads in the United States is $700 a mile, of gravel roads $2,000, of macadam $5,000 and of asphalt macadam $10,000 a mile.

It has been estimated that the states are spending about $250,000,000 a year on roads, and the expenditure is increasing every year.

Europe has a great advantage over us, because the old countries have handed down to them the best kinds of roads for centuries.

CHAPTER XXV.—Continued.

"Why not?" Wilson demanded, half irritably. "The secret is out. Everybody knows who you are. And now, because a boy who wouldn't have lived any—"

"That's not it," K. put in hastily. "I know all that. I guess I could do it and get away with it as well as the average. All that deters me—I've never told you, have I, why I gave up before?"

Wilson was propped up in his bed. K. was walking restlessly about the room, as was his habit when troubled.

"I've heard the gossip; that's all."

"You know what I always felt about the profession, Max. We went into that more than once in Berlin. Either one's best or nothing. I had done pretty well. When I left Lorch and built my own hospital, I hadn't a doubt of myself. And because I was getting results I got a lot of advertising. Men began coming to the clinics. I found I was making enough out of the patients who could pay to add a few free wards. I want to tell you now, Wilson, that the opening of those free wards was the greatest self-indulgence I ever permitted myself. I'd seen so much careless attention given the poor—well, never mind that. It was almost three years ago that things began to go wrong. I lost a big case."

"I know. All this doesn't influence me, Edwardes."

"Wait a moment. We had a system in the operating room as perfect as I could devise it. I never finished an operation without having my first assistant verify the clip and sponge count. But that first case died because a sponge had been left in the operating field. You know how those things go; you can't always see them, and one goes by the count, after reasonable caution. Then I almost lost another case in the same way—a free case."

"As well as I could tell, the precautions had not been relaxed. I was doing from four to six cases a day. After the second one I almost went crazy. I made up my mind, if there was ever another, I'd give up and go away."

"There was another?"

"Not for several months. When the last case died, a free case again, I performed my own autopsy. I allowed only my first assistant in the room. He was almost as frenzied as I was. It was the same thing again. When I told him I was going away, he offered to take the blame himself, to say he had closed the incision. He tried to make me think he was responsible. I knew—better."

"It's incredible."

"Exactly; but it's true. The last patient was a laborer. He left a family. I've sent them money from time to time. I used to sit and think about the children he left, and what would become of them. The ironic part of it was that, for all that had happened, I was busier all the time. Men were sending me cases from all over the country. It was either stay and keep on working, with that chance, or—quit. I quit."

"But if you had stayed, and taken extra precautions—"

"We'd taken every precaution we knew."

Neither of the men spoke for a time. K. stood, his tall figure outlined against the window.

"That's the worst, is it?" Max Wilson demanded at last.

"That's enough."

"It's extremely significant. You had an enemy somewhere—on your staff, probably. This profession of ours is a big one, but you know its jealousies. Let a man get his shoulders above the crowd, and the pack is after him." He laughed a little. "Mixed figure, but you know what I mean."

K. shook his head. He had had that gift of the big man everywhere, in every profession, of securing the loyalty of his followers. He would have trusted every one of them with his life.

"You're going to do it, of course."

"Take up your work?"

"Yes."

He stirred restlessly. To stay on, to be near Sidney, perhaps to stand by as Wilson's best man when she was married—it turned him cold. But he did not give a decided negative. The sick man was flushed and growing fretful; it would not do to irritate him.

"Give me another day on it," he said at last. "And so the matter stood."

Max's injury had been productive of good, in one way. It had brought the two brothers closer together. In the mornings Max was restless until Doctor Ed arrived. When he came, he brought books in the shabby bag—his beloved Burns, although he needed no book for that, the "Pickwick Papers," Renan's "Lives of the Disciples." Very often Max would doze off; but at the cessation of Doctor Ed's sonorous voice the sick man would stir fretfully and demand more. It pleased the older man vastly. It reminded him of Max's boyhood, when he had read to Max at night. For once in the last dozen years, he needed him.

"Go on, Ed. What in blazes makes you stop every five minutes?" Max protested, one day.

"Why not?" Wilson demanded, half irritably. "The secret is out. Everybody knows who you are. And now, because a boy who wouldn't have lived any—"

It reminded him of Max's boyhood, when he had read to Max at night. For once in the last dozen years, he needed him.

"Go on, Ed. What in blazes makes you stop every five minutes?" Max protested, one day.

so appraising, he shrank back into his chair.

"The man who did his best is quite real. You have always done your best in your work; you always will. But the other is a part of you too, Max. Even if I cared, I would not dare to run the risk."

She took a step toward the door, hesitated, came back, and put a light hand on his shoulder.

"I'm sorry, dear Max."

She had kissed him lightly on the cheek before he knew what she intended to do. So passionless was the little caress that, perhaps more than anything else, it typified the change in their relation.

When the door closed behind her, he saw that she had left her ring on the arm of his chair. He picked it up. It was still warm from her finger. He held it to his lips with a quick gesture. In all his successful life he had never before felt the bitterness of failure. The very warmth of the little ring hurt.

Why hadn't they let him die? He didn't want to live—he wouldn't live. Nobody cared for him! He would—

His eyes, lifted from the ring, fell on the red glow of the roses that had come that morning. Even in the half light, they glowed with fiery color.

The ring was in his right hand. With the left he settled his collar and soft silk tie.

K. saw Carlotta that evening for the last time. Katie brought word to him, where he was helping Harriet close her trunk—she was on her way to Europe for the fall styles—that he was wanted in the lower hall.

"A lady!" she said, closing the door behind her by way of caution. "And a good thing for her she's not from the alley. The way those people beg off you is a sin and a shame, and it's not at home you're going to be to them from now on."

So K. had put on his coat and, without so much as a glance in Harriet's mirror, had gone down the stairs. Carlotta stood under the chandelier, and he saw at once the ravages that trouble had made in her. She was a dead white, and she looked ten years older than her age.

"I came, you see, Doctor Edwardes." Evidently she found it hard to speak.

"You were to come," K. encouraged her, "to see if we couldn't plan something for you. Now, I think I've got it. You know, of course, that I closed my hospital. They are trying to persuade me to go back, and—I'm trying to persuade myself that I'm fit to go back. You see—his tone was determinedly cheerful—"my faith in myself has been pretty nearly gone. When one loses that, there isn't much left."

"You had been very successful." She did not look up.

"Well, I had and I hadn't. I'm not going to worry you about that. My offer is this: We'll just try to forget about—about Schwitter's and all the rest, and if I go back I'll take you on in the operating room."

"You sent me away once?"

"Well, I can ask you to come back, can't I?" He smiled at her encouragingly.

"Are you sure you understand about Max Wilson and myself?"

"Everyone makes mistakes now and then, and loving women have made mistakes since the world began. Most people live in glass houses, Miss Har-

"I'm almost always tired; that's all, Max."

She eyed him bravely.

"Aren't you going to let me make love to you at all? You get away beyond my reach."

"I was looking for the paper to read to you."

A sudden suspicion flamed in his eyes.

"Sidney, you don't like me to touch you any more. Come here where I can see you."

The fear of agitating him brought her quickly. For a moment he was appeased.

"That's more like it. How lovely you are, Sidney!" He lifted first one hand and then the other to his lips. "Are you ever going to forgive me?"

"If you mean about Carlotta, I forgive that long ago."

He was almost boyishly relieved. What a wonder she was! So lovely, and so sane. Many a woman would have held that over him for years—not that he had done anything really wrong on that nightmare excursion. But so many women are exigent about promises.

"When are you going to marry me?"

"We needn't discuss that tonight, Max. Can't we talk things over when you are stronger?"

Her tone caught his attention, and turned him a little white. He faced her to the window, so that the light fell on her.

"What things? What do you mean?"

He had forced her hand. She had meant to wait; but, with his keen eyes on her, she could not dissemble.

"I am going to make you very unhappy for a little while."

"Well?"

"I've had a lot of time to think. It isn't that I am angry. I am not even jealous. I was at first. It isn't that. It's hard to make you understand. I think you care for me."

"But, good heavens, Sidney, you do care for me, don't you?"

"I'm afraid I don't, Max; not enough."

She tried to explain, rather pitifully. After one look at his face, she spoke to the window.

"I'm so wretched about it. I thought I cared. To me you were the best and greatest man that ever lived. I—when I said my prayers, I—But that doesn't matter. You were a sort of god to me."

He groaned under his breath.

"No man could live up to that, Sidney."

"No. I see that now. But that's the way I cared. It's just that I never loved the real you, because I never knew you."

When he remained silent, she made an attempt to justify herself.

"I'd known very few men," she said. "I came into the hospital, and for a time life seemed very terrible. There were wickednesses I had never heard of, and somebody always paying for them. I was always asking, Why? Why? Then you would come in, and a lot of them you cured and sent out. You gave them their chance, didn't you see? Until I knew about Carlotta, you always meant that to me. You were like K.—always helping."

The room was very silent. In the purses' parlor, a few feet down the corridor, the nurses were at prayers.

"Yes, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death—"

The man in the chair stirred. He had come through the valley of the shadow, and for what? He was very bitter. He said to himself savagely that they would better have let him die.

"You say you never loved me because you never knew me. I'm not a rotter, Sidney. Isn't it possible that the man you cared about, who—who did his best by people and all that—is the real me?"

She gazed at him thoughtfully. He missed something out of her eyes, the sort of luminous, wistful greatness. Measured by this new glance, so clear, the next there was the news that Mr. Le Moyne had been only taking a holiday in the gas office and that he was really a very great surgeon and had saved Dr. Max Wilson.

The Street, which was busy at the time deciding whether to leave the old sidewalks or to put down cement ones, had one evening of mad excitement over the matter—of K., not the sidewalk—and then had accepted the new situation.

But over the news of K.'s approaching departure it mourned. The Street made a resolve to keep K., if possible. If he had shown any "high and mightiness," as they called it, since the change in his estate, it would have let him go without protest. But when a man is the real thing—so that the newspapers give a column to his having been in the city almost two years—and still goes about in the same shabby clothes, with the same friendly greeting for everyone, it demonstrates clearly, as the baritone put it, that "he's got no swelled head on him; that's sure."

A little later, K., coming up the Street as he had that first day, heard the baritone singing:

"Home is the hunter, home from the hill, And the sailor, home from the sea."

Home! Why, this was home. The Street seemed to stretch out its arms to him. The alanthus tree waved in the sunlight before the little house. Tree and house were old; September had touched them. Christine sat sewing on the balcony. A boy with a piece of chalk was writing something on the new cement under the tree. He stood back, head on one side, when he had finished, and inspected his work. K. read in chalk on the smooth street:

Max Wilson.
Sidney Page.

The baritone was still singing; but now it was "I'm twenty-one, and she's eighteen." The light was gone from K.'s face again. After all, the Street meant for him not so much home as it meant Sidney. And now, before very long, that book of his life, like others, would have to be closed.

He turned and went heavily into the little house.

Christine called to him from her little balcony:

"I thought I heard your step outside. Have you time to come in?"

K. went through the parlor and stood in the long window. His steady eyes looked down at her.

"I see very little of you now," she complained. And, when he did not reply immediately: "Have you made any definite plans, K.?"

"I shall do Max's work until he is able to take hold again. After that—"

"You will go away?"

"I think so. I am getting a good many letters, one way and another. I suppose, now I'm back in harness, I'll stay. My old place is closed. I'd go back there—they want me. But it seems so futile, Christine, to leave as I did, because I felt that I had no right to go on as things were; and now to crawl back on the strength of having had my hand forced, and to take up things again, not knowing that I've a bit more right to do it than when I left!"

"I went to see Max yesterday. You know what he thinks about all that."

He took an uneasy turn up and down the balcony.

"But who?" he demanded. "Who would do such a thing? I tell you, Christine, it is impossible."

She did not pursue the subject, for thoughts had flown ahead to the little house without K., to days without his steps on the stairs or the heavy creak of his big chair overhead as he dropped into it.

But perhaps it would be better if he went. She had her own life to live. She had no expectation of happiness, but, somehow or other, she must build on the shaky foundation of her marriage a house of life, with resignation serving for content, perhaps with fear lurking always. That she knew. But with no active misery. Misery implied affection, and her love for Palmer was quite dead.

"Sidney will be here this afternoon."

"Good." His tone was noncommittal.

"Has it occurred to you, K., that Sidney is not very happy?"

He stopped in front of her.

"She's had a great anxiety."

"She has no anxiety now. Max is doing well."

"Then what is it?"

"I'm not quite sure, but I think I know. She's lost faith in Max, and she's not like me. I—I knew about Palmer before I married him. It's all rather hideous—I needn't go into it. But Sidney has more character than I have. Max isn't what she thought he was, and I doubt whether she'll marry him."

K. glanced toward the street where Sidney's name and Max's lay open to the sun and to the smiles of the Street. Christine might be right, but that did not alter things for him.

Christine's thoughts went back inevitably to herself; to Palmer, who was doing better just now; to K., who was going away—went back with an ache to the night K. had taken her in his arms and then put her away. How wrong things were! What a mess life was!

"Poor Jim."

They tell it of a place on Van Buren street:

"Here," said the proprietor, "is a little gift for you and Jim. Each bottle is the finest old whisky. You drop in at Jim's on your way and give him this, will you?"

"Certainly," cried the grateful one. On his way he fell and broke one bottle.

"Poor Jim!" he muttered, picking himself up.—Chicago Herald.

CHAPTER XXVI.

Late September had come. The Street had been furiously busy for a month. The cobblestones had gone, and from curb to curb stretched smooth asphalt. To this general excitement the strange case of Mr. Le Moyne had added its quota. One day he was in the gas office, making out statements that were absolutely ridiculous. And rise. And don't make any mistake about this: People can always come back. No depth is too low. All they need is the will power."

He smiled down at her. She had come armed with confession. But the offer meant reinstatement, another chance. She would work her fingers ends off for him. She would make it up to him in other ways. But she could not tell him and lose everything.

"Come," he said. "Shall we go back and start over again?"

He held out his hand.

"Don't think too much of your own methods. Watch other people's ways and learn from them." This is good advice, especially when bilious or constipated. You will find many people who use Chamberlain's Tablets for these ailments with the best results, and will do well to follow their example.—Adv.

Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure now known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers that they offer One Hundred Dollars for any case that it fails to cure. Send for list of testimonials. Address: P. J. ## Nature Cures, The Doctor Takes the Fee.

There is an old saying that "Nature cures, the doctor takes the fee," but as everyone knows you can help Nature very much and thereby enable it to effect a cure in much less time than is usually required. This is particularly true of colds. Chamberlain's Cough Remedy relieves the lungs, liquefies the tough mucus and aids in its expectoration, always the system to a healthy condition.—Adv.

Don't Read KAZAN

If you ever in your life did a mean thing to a dog, for it will not improve your opinion of yourself. But, if you care at all for the one animal in brute creation capable of absolutely unselfish devotion, do read the story. It will call out all the sympathy and love your nature holds. The picture of Kazan fighting alone through the arctic blizzard, dragging an unconscious woman and baby on the heavy sledge behind him, is one that will stay with you for a while.
